A specific version for big game hunting. The rifled barrel has a precision bored 18.4 mm bore and vent holes at its end. This particularity allows a notorious reduction of the recoil and the raising of the weapon in shooting, but also an improvement of the precision.

This effect, less known to the general public, is based on the fact that the exit of the propulsion gases through the "ported" holes makes it possible to significantly reduce the turbulence at the rear of the projectile, which is therefore more stable on its trajectory.
